Background of the research

As enterprises embrace digital transformation and next-generation technology solutions, talent is becoming a key imperative to deliver on their transformation mandate and business objectives. Most business leaders concede that talent holds the secret to their future value and success. However, despite the perceived importance of workforce planning, enterprises have adopted a lacklustre approach to talent management leading to challenges in talent availability and readiness. Market forces such as lack of alignment between academia and industry along with high demand for technology talent across industries and functions have further led to gaps in talent availability. These forces have also resulted in acute shortage of technology talent for selective skills along with low project readiness of the available talent pool.

To help enterprises future-proof their workforce strategy and turn talent management into a science, Everest Group has tracked 1,150+ hard skills across the IT services stack with respect to current and unmet demand in the industry. Enterprises can use this detailed skills taxonomy along with our “Talent Performance Framework” for talent management to plan their current and future talent requirements.

The aim of this report is to share perspectives on ways to future-proof enterprise talent strategy. It also sheds light on how COVID-19 is impacting enterprise talent models and workforce strategy, making enterprises rethink their working models, workforce distribution, and approach to talent management.

Overview and abbreviated summary of key messages

The aim of this report is to share perspectives on ways to future-proof enterprise talent strategy. It also sheds light on how COVID-19 is impacting enterprise talent models and workforce strategy, making enterprises rethink their working models, workforce distribution, and approach to talent management.

Some of the findings in this report, among others, are:

The war for talent is real

- Talent shortage is viewed as a key impediment to achieving business outcomes
- Organization-specific factors such as undifferentiated talent value proposition and poor talent management practices are leading to talent shortage
- Market factors such as rapid pace of technology change and mismatch between education curriculum and industry needs are further widening the talent demand supply gap

Talent Performance Framework to future proof workforce strategy

- To meet talent needs in a post digital world, organizations will need a holistic, integrated approach to talent management
- Holistic view of talent strategy will involve elements of effective demand-supply planning and a right-fit sourcing and location strategy
- Leveraging the right channels to acquire talent and proactively identifying learning needs will form key pillars of people strategy
- Advanced analytics and new technologies will play a key role in helping enterprises attract, assess, and develop talent

Enterprise guide to building skills of the future

- Enterprises will need to adopt a well-defined roadmap to meet their current and future talent needs, turning workforce planning into a continuous and proactive process
- Skills development framework will help guide the enterprise talent development strategy, for specific skills within a given competency area, based on external market factors

Impact of COVID-19 on workforce strategy

- COVID-19 is making enterprises rethink their working model, reconsider workforce distribution, and evolve their talent management practices
- Adopting an empathy-driven approach to talent management will be the key pillar enabling a sustainable talent management strategy
